What are some of the differences you've noticed between a school environment and a professional work environment?
Considering that the main purpose of primary education is to prepare students for the workforce, it's definitely interesting to see the ways in which it has and hasn't achieved that goal. One of the key differences I noticed is that professional environments such as the one in Red Hat's office tend to be more laidback in terms of social expectations. People are allowed to contribute their unique ideas in so many different ways, and they do it for love of the craft rather than because they are required to receive a grade in a class. It's nice to be in a shared space where everyone has a common interest in mind.
